Chef Donna's Review:

In Baking at République, Chef Margarita Manzke uses the best of everything. And by the best, she means best seasonal ingredients that should be included in your baking. Even when she runs down her "must have" ingredients, she limits her list to about 4 that for the most part are available in a well-stocked grocer (or easily on-line for the few odd sounding ingredients – and I do mean few, probably about 3). For the harder to find items do not fret. Manzke explains their purpose and gives you permission to skip the small quantity needed, as long as you're willing to forgo an ultra-silky texture or high-gloss finished glaze.

Baking at Republique treats seasonal fruit as the crown jewels of the pastry case. The photos of the raw ingredients and finished pastry make you want to rethink mounding your fruit in a bowl on your counter. Manzke advocates clear, true flavors that make sense and work well together. She says she starts with what she has and what is available to her. Then, she seasons it properly so that the fruit tastes like fruit, the bread and crusts taste buttery and toasty, and the creams silky and just sweet enough.

Never one to combine flavors just for the sake of putting together something new, Baking at Republique doesn't shy away from intriguing flavor profiles. Whether it's the Raspberry-Pistachio Kouign Amanns (traditional French pastries from Breton known for the crunchy-sugary-caramely-crackly texture when you bite into them), or the Black Sesame-Kumquat Eclairs or the Fig Tahini Cookies. Still, there are just as many familiar-sounding combinations like S'mores Bomboloni, Lemon Meringue Tart and Republiques Chocolate Chip Cookies.

The master recipes that start each chapter are the backbone to Baking at Republique. Manzke explains how these particular master recipes found their way into Républiques repertoire, then provides the concise but thorough explanation for the master dough, batter, or pastry. After that you are provided with more options than you can imagine, and learn how each master recipe translates into a different presentation. The brioche master recipe is mind-blowing. You learn to make the dough, which becomes loaves, then Thick Cut Caramelized French Toast, Cast Iron Apricot Brioche Bread Pudding, Creamed Leek, Mushroom, and Goat Cheese Brioche Tarts, Bacon and Gruyere Cheese Brioche, Brioche Fruit Tarts, Orange-Chocolate Babka Rolls, Cardamom Sticky Buns, Sticky Bombs, and finally S'mores Bomboloni. Yes! It's like that for the entire book.

The Basic Components chapter will leave you equally delighted with a complete lineup of jams, marmalades, creams and sauces. Baking at Republique concludes as it opens, with a recipe that clinches this book as a library must have. Manzke opens with The Best Easiest Baked Dessert: Nectarine and Blackberry Crisp that is make ahead, its components freezable, and literally quick and flawless; she closes with her encore: Stollen.

And, yes, baking – especially pastry, is methodical and precise, Manzke does not mind admitting she is not always perfectly methodical and precise. The number one key to success she says is wanting to be present and willing to learn. Baking at Republique is just like that and these recipes are recipes that anyone can master, and everyone will be more than happy to eat.
